DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The John B. Davis House is a two-story, gable-roofed dwelling vertical plank construction on a stone foundation. Its basic configuration is a three bay by two bay, center hall plan with a one-story, shed-roofed wing at the rear that is original to the house. An unusual use of transoms and sidelights on the facade, and a very finely crafted exterior stone chimney are the distinguishing features of this building.

Its coursed, dressed stone foundation, with full basement is continuous between the main block and the rear wing. The sills are square hewn timbers, and the basement joists are logs, hewn on their top faces only. Weatherboard siding, with an additional layer of asphalt shingles, covers the vertical plank support system.

The facade (NW elevation) has a symmetrical, three bay, center door arrangement that is sheltered by a shed-roofed porch. Its raised four-panel door is surrounded by a nine light transom and three-pane sidelights over single, raised panels. The window in the second floor, center bay has a similar effect, it being a 3/6 sash with three-pane sidelights and an eleven light transom. 6/6 sash windows, with their original panes, occupy the other four facade openings. The porch, a later addition, has a poured concrete foundation with turned posts supporting its roof.

The northeast endwall contains an exterior stone chimney that is flanked by 6/6 sash windows on the first floor and 1/1 sash replacements on the second floor. The chimney is a finely shaped, shouldered stack made of chiseled ashlar.

The southwest endwall is punctuated by four 6/6 sash windows, two per floor, and a recently added exterior, cinderblock chimney.

At the rear, the shed-roofed wing occupies the northern half of the wall, and a bay of 6/6 sash windows occupies the southern end.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The John B. Davis House is an interesting example of an early building constructed using vertical planks which serve both as house frame and sheathing material. This method of construction was just gaining in popularity in Garrett County after mid-century, but continued to be built in to the early twentieth century. The shouldered, exterior stone chimney on its endwall is a recognisable feature on buildings in this vicinity dating around the middle of the nineteenth century and before. Its facade 3/6 sash window with transom and sidelights is an odd decorative feature, it being the only known example in the county.

John B. Davis, a black man¹, bought this 200 acre tract called "Triumph", in 1859 for $400.00.² In 1887, when the property was next sold, it contained close to 300 acres and commanded a $2,301.00 price.³ This large rise in value suggests that Davis probably bought the land undeveloped, and then improved it substantially during his ownership. The 1887 deed refers to the property as the "Home Farm" of the late John B. Davis".
